Description

Vorobliachyn. Church of the Transfiguration of the Lord

The remains of an ancient defensive city from the period of the old Rus were discovered by archaeologists at the Zamchisko tract in Vorobliachyun. The village itself was first mentioned in 1409 in historical records. In later period, Vorobliachyn had an ancient wooden church from the XVIII century, which was transferred to a scansen in Kiev in 1980.

In the modern times, the village has a stone Church of the Transfiguration of the Lord, built in 1922 as part of the larger project by the famous Lviv architect Alexander Lushpynsky, and is a perfect example of his relentless search for the national identity and style in architecture, much like other national styles that arose in Europe at that time. The style of Lushpynsky buildings is often characterized as "Hutsul secession". The peculiarity of the style lies in elements of the traditional folk architecture, which connects it to the Ukrainian modern style of the Upper Dnipro area.
